EITHER—OR, aut—aut. vel—vel. sive (seu)—sive (seu).—Obs. 1) Aut is objective, and refers to a real difference in the things or notions themselves: vel is subjective, and relates to a difference between them as contemplated by the mind of the person who is speaking or acting about them; aut—aut therefore should be used when things are strongly opposed in their own nature, aut dives aut pauper; aut frigus aut calor; aut Cicero aut Pompeius, &c. Aut—aut should also be used

In the sense of either, or at least [aut in omni, aut in magnâ parte vitæ, C. Tusc. 3, 17, 28.]. Aut—aut may stand in interrogative and comparative sentences, and may follow negatives. (2) Vel—vel. In aut—aut the members necessarily exclude each other; in vel—vel they only exclude each other arbitrarily, according to the view of the speaker, and it is not implied that they might not possibly co-exist. Vel—vel sometimes approaches to the meaning of sive—sive; i. e. the speaker conceives the things as different indeed, but not essentially, so that it is immaterial which is taken: pace vel Quirini vel Romuli dixerim. The second vel may be strengthened by etiam, vero etiam, or omnino. (3) Sive—sive is the 'either—or' of indifference, the speaker leaving it undecided, fm ignorance or any other motive, weh name, supposition, &c., is the correct one; e. g. sive casu, sive consilio; sive felicitate quadam, sive bonitate nature, &c. In the best prose, exly in C. sive—sive is used; with the exception, however, of Cæsar, who has often seu—seu. In post-Aug. writers we have also sive—seu, or seu—sive. The second sive may be strengthened by etiam.—(4) After negatives, the usual way of translating 'either—or' is by (neque)—neque; e. g. nemo unquam neque poeta neque orator fuit; nihil loci est neque æginitæ neque concordie [see end of Obs. 1, on aut]. Not either—or, neque (neq)—neque (neq). E.—or even, aut—aut etiam, aut—aut vero (the second being the stronger supposition).—vel—vel etiam; vel etiam vero; vel omnino. ~~the~~ The aut or vel may be repeated three or more times. The first aut or vel may also be omitted, just as in English; we must (either) conquer or die, hic (a ut) vincendum, aut moriendum milites.

EITHER (of the two), alteruter (either one or the other).—uter, uterque (mly 'which', 'whichever' of the two, but ita = 'either'; e. g. si uter [orator et decurmanus] velit).—uterlibet. utervis (either of the two indifferently).—utrum mavis (weh of the two you choose). Nor did he wish to deprive the state of e. army, neque republicam alterutro exercitu privare voluit: if any one had not been of e. side, si qui non alterutrus partis fuisset: take or choose e., utrumlibet elige or utrum horum mavis accipere: in e. way the consequence will be a great confusion, utroquequo modo summa sequetur confusio (Q. 3, 6, 29). I have less strength than e. of you, minus habeo virum, quam utervis vestrum: let e. abuse the other, uterque utrumque vituperato. Not—either, neuter; on either (= each) side, alterutrumque (Plin. 20, 7, 26).

FIRST, adj. primus (so far as, in space or time, he makes his appearance f., and others follow him)—princeps (so far as he acts f., and others follow his example)—summus. maximus. præcipuus (fig. post-Aug., principialis; except in f. causes, causæ principales; opp. secundary causes)—primarius (f. in rank, dignity, or value). The f. men in the state; see 'CHIEF men.' The f. point, caput rei. summa cap. rei. cardo cs rei (on which all turns; V. and Q.).—momentum (down, the critical, decisive point). It was ever his case, ei semper maxima or antiquissima cura fuit: to make athg one's f. object, omne studium in qâ re ponere. This is the f. point, hoc caput est; hoc maximum or primum est. To fall in love at f. sight, devenire or incidere in amorem uno aspectu (Auct. ad Her. 2, 30, 33). Nobody ran fall in love at f. sight, nemo potest uno aspectu neque præteritis in amorem devenire (ib.). For 'in the first place,' see FIRST, adv.—~~Q. 1~~ The three f. tres primi (e. g. tribus primis diebus, Cæs. B. C. 1, 18, which may help to banish the foolish notion that accuracy requires us to say 'the first three'). He considered that the f. thing was, &c., nihil prius faciendum putavit.

~~Q. 2~~ The Latins regarded as an opposition the closer definition, which in English is expressed by a rel. proposition, or by an infn.—I was the f. who did it, or the f. to do it, primus feci. If only two are spoken of, the f. is prior, opp. to the second, posterior; or, if there be a ref. to two subjects already named, ille (the second being expressed by hic). If f. = earliest, ultimus is used; ab ultimo origine: the f. (= next) aft. thing, proximus. If the f. thing, = the most important thing, summum or caput is used; e. g. the f. step towards a happy life is, caput est ad bene vivendum: he considered that the f. thing should be, nihil prius faciendum putavit. To be the f. in athg, initium cs rei facere, capere, ducere (to do it, to make a beginning); principem esse in re; optimum, præstantissimum esse in qo genere; cs rei principatum obtinere (to be the most excellent): let us be neither f. nor last, nec duces simus, nec agmen claudamus: each wishing to be the f. (on the road), quum sibi quisque primum itineris locum peteret: to be the f. of his class, classem ducere (Q. 1, 2, 28): to be the f. aft. the king, secundum imperii gradum tenere: I am the f. (to get up) in the morning, and the last at night (in going to bed), primus cubitu surgo, postremum cubitum eo.

FIRST, adv. ¶ At first, primo (the general distinction between primo and primum is, that primo relates to time, primum to the order of occurrence; so that primo = 'at first,' implying that a change took place afterwards, primum = 'first,' when followed by what was done afterwards, in the second, third, last place, &c. Though this distinction is not universal, it should be observed by Lat. writers with this exception, according to Zumpt and Hand. vol. iv. p. 558 [apud Haase], that when deinde or postea follows, C. usually places primum for 'at first').—principio (at the beginning, originally; jus augurum divinationis opinione principio constitutum est; postea Sc. C.)—initio (at the outset: redeo ad illud quod initio scripsi).—~~Q. 3~~ primo may be followed by post, postea, deinde, inde, dehinc, tum, postremo, ad extremum, tandem mox, nunc, jam (Hand. iv. p. 558: Curt. has primo—sed jam). ¶ Before all others, primus (adj., the f., opp. postremus)—prior (adj., the f. or foremost of two, opp. posterior)—in primis (before all others, f.).—~~Q. 4~~ It would be incorrect, in this sense, to say primo: he must get up f., and go to bed last, primus cubitu surgat, postremum cubitum eat: whichever party f. occupied this pass, would have no trouble in keeping off the enemy, qui prior has angustias occupaverit, ad hoc hostem prohiberi nihil esse negotii: he f., or f. of all, post Adherbal to death, then the rest, in primis Adherbaletem necat, dein omnes.

(but only in cases in which contra or adversus would express the contrary notion; the primary notion of 'for' or 'in a by's place' being always prominent)*.—secundum with acc. (in accordance with, but never expressing, like ex, causality).—in usum or gratiam (in favour of a by, for a by's advantage, use, &c.). To vote for a by (e.g. at an election, &c.), suffragio suo ornare qm; suffragio suo adjuvare qm in petendis honoribus; suffragari ci ad munus (see Plin. Ep. 2, 1, 8; 8, 23, 2; C. cl qd: we are not preparing ourselves for the school, but for life, non scholae, sed vitae discimus: for the public or general welfare, omnium salutis causa. ¶ Towards, in. adversus (both with acc. in a friendly as well as a hostile sense).—erga (in a friendly sense only; e. g. love for abj, amor in or erga qm). ¶ In many instances, however, an oblique case is sufficient to express 'for'; e. g. a remedy for fear, remedium timoris (or timori); love for abj, amor ea; care for you, vestri cura: an oblique case must not, however, be used unless where it is quite free from ambiguity: an oblique case (viz the dative) is also sufficient aff. certain adjectives; e. g. after 'fit', 'conveniens', &c.; but also the gen. is used instead; e. g. anxious for alth, studiosus ea rei. So after 'is becoming' or 'unbecoming' for abj, decet or dedecet qm. ¶ In proportion, according to, pro (different both from secundum, which denotes accordance, and fm ex, which implies causality): for my part, pro mea parte (i. e. according to the measure of my strength; ~~pro~~ quidem has been generally explained 'I for my part'; but Hand shows that this force does not belong to it, but that of an affirmative particle, the affirmation referring to the speaker. Since, however, 'I for my part' is often little more than this, affirming that the speaker will do so and so, whether others do or not, 'I for my part' is often sufficiently translated by quidem): every one for himself, pro sua quaque parte: for so great a victory there was but little bloodshed, minor clades quam pro tantâ victoriâ fuit: they are very few for the number of the well-disposed, pro multitudine bene sentientium admodum pauci: they thought that, for their numbers and their military glory, their territory was too confined, pro multitudine hominum et pro gloriâ belli angustos se fines habere arbitrabantur (Cæs.). Another Crcl. by which this proportion 'for' is translated is with ut, where 'esse' or 'expectari' poterat must be supplied; e. g. he was learned for those times, erat, ut temporibus illis (ac. esse poterat) eruditus. So; a rich man for those times, ut tum erat tempora, dives: an eloquent man for a Theban, satis exercitatus in dicendo, ut Thebanus scilicet (Np.). ¶ Denoting purpose, its by the gerundive, or by the gerund in the gen. with 'causâ' or by the acc. with ad; e. g. Antigonus delivered up the corpse of Eumenes to his friends for interment, Antigonus Eumenem mortuum propinquus ejus sepeliendum tradidit: for the purpose of foraging, pabulandi causâ (e. g. tres legiones mittere): for the purpose of laying Celtiberia waste, ad depopulandum Celtiberiam. By later writers the participle fut. act. is used in similar cases after verbs denoting or implying motion. To do alth f. the purpose of &c., facere qd eo consilio, ut &c. 'For' may also be translated by the supine: for the purpose of imploring, &c., (venlunt) rogatum, &c.; and by ut or qui with subj. ¶ Denoting duration of time; e. g. for ten days, pro decem dies. It is often a sign of the false. It is impossible for me, hoc facere, efficere non possum: it is impossible for me to &c., fieri non potest, ut &c., or nequeo with infn.; e. g. it is impossible for a king to live like a private person, nascitur rex, vivere privatus: for instance, or example, verbi or exempli causâ or gratiâ; ut vel (SYN. For must be carefully used: dicere pro qâ re and contra rem are false; but to speak for and against, is in utramque partem. Of price, of course, for must be omitted. For, with ref. to a coming time, not pro but in hunc annum, proximum annum, &c. To be prepared for, paratum esse ad qd (e. g. ad omnes casus). For the present, nunc, in præsentia, hoc tempore. FOR, conj. (alleging a reason or cause), nam. namque. enim. etenim (with this difference, that 'nam' introduces the subsequent sentences, as explicatives of the preceding one; the statement contained in the latter being defined by certain reasons alleged. The sentence joined by 'nam' appears only as an appendix, as it were, to the preceding one; hence 'namque': both, as a general rule, stand at the beginning of the sentence: 'enim' is used if the subsequent sentence is necessary to render the preceding one intelligible, or establish the proof of whatever has been advanced in it: in this latter case the reason alleged is as important as the assertion itself: the copulative 'et' is used to show the connexion; and hence 'etenim', which precedes the sentence for the purpose of giving prominence to the reason contained in it; whereas 'enim', if standing by itself, is always inserted somewhere into the sentence; comp. Zumpt, § 345). [For etenim and enim both sometimes assert what the speaker wishes to be taken for granted; etenim is also used in explanatory parentheses, and in questions, in which enim is also used; but etenim (= et quum ita res sit, quæso) makes the connexion more distinct; Pr. Intr. II. 791]. For—not, neque enim (but non enim is not so uncommon in C. as is supposed; Pr. Intr. II. 789): for since, etenim, quoniam: for if, etenim si (ib. 791): for—never, neque unquam. For nothing is, nihil est enim (ib. 792) in a sentence with est beginning with the predicate, or non, num, nemo, nihil, quis, or if est is emphatic, est mihi tace the second, enim the third place; Pr. Intr. Grot. § 126. Obsev. 4. Ramsh. § 150, 1; e usually stands before consonants, ex before vowels; with respect to a, ab, abs, (1) abs, in C's time, was nearly confined to account books [Or. 47, 158]; it occurs only, and that but seldom, before c, g, t. (2) ab may stand, as well as a, 'before all consonants' [Freund; Krebs except m and v]. (3) ab must stand before vowels and h). To go away fm aby, a qd discedere: to come down fm the rostrum, de rostris descendere: to alight fm a horse, ex equo descendere: to come down f. a hill, &c. into the plain, ex loco superiore in planitiem descendere. *With many verbs and adjectives 'from' is not expressed, but implied by an oblique case, mostly by the abl., e. g. to free or exempt aby f. punishment, qm poenâ liberare: free f. guilt, liber a culpâ; vacuus a culpâ; liber culpâ. The preposition 'from' is not expressed before the names of a town or small island, but the abl. is used to express the relation: a preposition however becomes necessary, if a place is to be pointed out more distinctly or minutely; or if only a part of a town or its neighbourhood are spoken of [e. g. Libo discessit a Brundisio = fm the harbour of Brundisium; Cæs. B. C. 3, 24]; in a similar manner, if that preposition has a stress upon it, and stands in contradistinction [usque a Dianio ad Sinopen navigarunt, C. Verr. 2, 1, 34; erat a Gergoviâ despectus in castra, Cæs. Ad Athenis proficisci in animo habebam, C. Fam. 4, 12, 2]; likewise, if an appellative, as urbs, oppidum, locus, stands in apposition to the name of the town [as, ex oppido Gergoviâ, Cæs.; ex Apolloniâ, Pont. urbe, Plin.]; with domus the preposition is used, when dom. does not mean 'home' as usual residence; but = 'house' as building, or 'family'. So rus = 'country', is without the preposition, but takes it when a particular 'estate' is meant. Sis, however, the acc. is used; to desert f. aby, qm deserere (also a qd deficere, or desciscere).—In several cases the Latins make use of certain adverbs, of place and time, to express this preposition, e. g., f. that place (thence), that time, inde: f. that very same place, indidem: f. hence, hinc (not abhinc): f. afar, procul: f. all sides, undique: f. both a-des, utrimque: f. without, extrinsecus: f. within, intrinsecus: f. from to town, oppidatim: f. house to house, ostriatim: f. man to man, virilitim.—How a) To recover f. a disease, convalescere ex (not a) morbo: to return f. a journey, redire, reverti; venire ex (not ab) itinere: all the way f. (even f.) the ocean, &c., usque ab oceano.—β) In poetry the abl. of the place whence may be used without a preposition, where in prose the preposition must be expressed [e. g. cadere nubibus; descendere caelo; labi equo, &c., Z. 481].—γ) Ex is used like our f., to denote a change f. a previous state; e. g. I made good f. my slave a free man, a servo to libertum feci; so nihil est tam miserabile, quam ex beato miser.—δ) 'From,' when it follows a subst., is often expressed by the objective genitive; as, death is a rest fm all labours and troubles, mors laborum ac miserialum quiet est.—ε) To denote a person's residence, or the place of his birth, &c., an adj. is only used; e. g. Mllo f. Croton, Mllo Cronotates; but stas, exly by L., is used; e. g. Turnus ab Ariciâ [L. 1, 50, 3] = Turnus Aricinus.—ζ) F. his very boyhood, jam inde a puero (not inde a puero without jam).—η) After 'different' f. is translated by ac, atque. (= to have that task, &c.), by partec. in dus: I have got many letters to write, multas mihi epistolas scribendæ sunt. — ~~to~~ To have got' [= to have] a book, &c., is objected to by Webster and other writers as a vulgarism; but it is not only thoroughly idiomatical, but may be easily justified. 'To get' being 'to acquire' (receive, obtain, &c.): 'to have got' = 'to have acquired' (received, obtained), and so 'to have,' 'to possess'; and it so happens that the sister word has the same peculiarity in Greek, κτ-δομαι, 'I get' [where the radicals κτ- correspond to gt, the smooth mule a having passed, according to Grimm's law, into the middle mule g]; κτ-ῆναι, 'I have got' = 'I have' or 'possess.' Webster also objects to 'I could not get him to do this' [Addison], and 'I could not get the work done,' as not elegant. It is to be hoped that the time for sacrificing our old idioms to modern and sickly notions of elegance is pretty nearly gone by. — For other combinations, e. g. to get aby's CONSENT, &c., see the subtt.

Off. 1, 37, 134, &c.).—affectum esse qd re (to be affected with alth, espily with an evil: to be in a certain state or condition).—uti qo or qd re (to h. a person who is employed, or thing that is used, to enjoy the use of alth, can be used only when 'to have' has these meanings; hence it is not Lat. to say, 'he had a barber for his father; patre unus est tonsore [= he employed his father as his barber] for natus est patre tonsore or patrem habebat tonsorem; nor patris usus est insult N. for patriam habebat insult N. N.—ignotis iudicibus quam notis uti malle [to prefer having judges who were strangers to him, &c.] is right, he having an object in this; i. e. that of escaping through their ignorance of his character.—he had a frugal man for his father, usus est patre diligenti; see examples with uti below).—valere qd re (to be strong by means of alth, or in alth, e. g. naval power, popularity, &c.).—penes qm est qd (alth is lodged with, or put in the hands of alth; e. g. To h. money, troops, ornatum esse pecunia, copitis: to h. great wealth, divitiis or opibus et copis affluere: to h. children, liberis auctum esse: to h. a great many children, beatissimum esse liberis: to h. children by a woman, liberis ex qd (not ab qd) sustulisse or suscepisse: to h. a woman for one's wife, habere qm in matrimonio: to h. aby for one's husband, nuptum esse ci: to h. aby for or as a friend, habere qm amicum; uti qo amico: to h. a most intimate friend in aby, uti qo familiariter or intime (to h. intimate intercourse with aby): to have aby for an enemy, infestus est mihi qs: to h. a good (true) friend in aby, habere qm bonum amicum: to h. a stout friend or enemy in aby, fortem amicum or inimicum expertum esse qm (both Np. Them. 9, 4): to h. equal rights (with aby), eodem jure or iladem legibus uti: to h. a favorable wind, successus in war, uti ventis secundis, uti proclis secundis: those whom I had with me, qui erant mecum (q. t. as companions); quos habebam mihi ad manum (as paucis, for support): I had few (attendants) with me, pauci circum me erant: to h. persons with him, homines circum pedes habere: to a person always about one, qm sibi affixum habere: to h. aby for colleague, partner, &c., qo socius mihi adjunctus est: to h. a person over one, ci subjunctum or subjectum esse: to h. aby (433) under one, ci praeesse or praepositum esse: to h. the enemy before one, e. regione hostis (hostium) esse or stare: to long to h. alth, egere qd re: to h. a disease, morbo correptum esse; but, to h. a fever, febrem or febrium (or dim.) febriaculum habere (C.): to h. no fever, febrem non habere; febri carere; a febre liberari (if the person has had it). ¹⁶⁵ 'To have,' with sublati, espily with abstract sublati, is often expressed in Lat. by verbs containing the notion of such sublati; as, to h. pleasure or delight in alth, gaudere or delectari qd re: to h. leisure for alth, vacare ci rei (see the particular sublati with weh 'have' is used). Not to h., carere qd re: to h. enough, nihil ultra flagitare: no longer to h. a parent, parentibus orbem or orbatum or privatum esse: he has enough to live upon, habet qui or unde utatur. alth has something in it, non temere fit; est qd in re momenti; ci rei subest qd (e. g. a report has something in it).

Hence, 'to have,' in a wider acceptance, a) e. g., to h. received: now you h. my plans, habes consilia nostra: you h. it now, hem tibi! you h. this for your time-serving, hunc fructum refert ex isto tuo utriusque partis studio. b) To have heard, to know; e. g., to h. alth on good authority, qd certo auctore or certis auctoribus cognovisse: I h. the information fm your brother, hoc accipere a fratre tuo; hoc audivi de fratre tuo. c) To get, to take, to receive, accipere (of what you deliver over): there you h. the book, accipe librum (as H. Sat. 1, 4, 14, accipe tabulas): here you h. two hundred quires (of paper), tu vero aufer ducentos scapos (C. Att. 5, 4, 4): there! you h. it! utere, accipe! (as Plaut. Mil. 3, 1, 176): new bread may always be had here, semper hic recentis panis est copia: that can easily be had, parabilis. d) to wish or desire to h., i. s. to demand, request, order, wish, desire; e. g. what would you h.? quid vis? quid postulas? what would you h. with me? quid est, quod me velis? I would h. you do so and so, tu velim facias &c.

2) To hold in the hand, to carry or wear on oneself, habere, tenere (to hold), gestare (to carry, bear, wear): to h. in one's hands, (in) manibus habere or tenere: to h. in the hand (to lead), manu ducere: to h. about, secum habere or portare or gestare; esse cum qd re (e. g. cum telo): to h. something perpetually in one's mouth (to be continually mentioning it), qd semper in ore habere.

3) In connexion with the infin., in various relations: a) The infin. aft. 'I have,' is often equivalent to a relative clause; e. g., 'I have nothing to accuse old age of' = 'I have nothing, of weh I may accuse old age,' nihil (or non) habeo, quod iudicem senectutem; nihil habeo, quod ad te scribam: I h. nothing to write, non habeo, quod scribam (but in non habeo, quid scribam, habeo would = scio, cognitum or perspectum habeo, I do not know what to write; see Beier. C. Off. 2, 2, 7; Krüger, 615, Obs. 6): this is what I had to say, haec habui, quae dicerem (not hæc habui dicere, weh is a Grecism): he has nothing to accuse us of, non est, cur nos incuset. b) The infin. aft. 'to have,' is its equivalent to an expression of duty, or rather denotes a task. Here it must be rendered by the partic. of the future passive; as, every one has to employ his own judgement, suo cuique iudicio utendum est: I h. many letters to write, multæ litteræ mihi scribendæ sunt. In this construction, in the consequence of a conditional proposition, 'I would have,' &c. suit is more common than I have; e. g. if you had lived, you would h. had to undergo alth, at vixisses, qd tibi subeundum fuit. || To have a thing done, = to get it done, is to be translated by curare, with partic. in dus. I had him honorably buried, funus ei satis amplum faciendum curavi. But ¹⁶⁶ a person is, as in English, oft. said to do what he really gets done for him; I will h. you put to death, interficiam te; wishing to h. a ring made, quum vellet annulum alibi facere. || Have = have caught (colloq.): I h. you (there)! teneo te! or hic te teneo! (colloq.): e. g. teneo te, inquam, nam &c., C. Acad. 2, 48, 148; hic te, inquit, teneo; non est istud iudicium pati; C. Quint. 10, 63). || In answers, 'I have' is really equivalent to the perfect def. of the verb asking the question: 'thus have you conquered?' 'I have' = 'I have conquered,' vici. If the question is 'have you got it?' = 'do you possess it?' the answer will be in the present: h. you got it? teneas? I h., teneo.

HE, is implied in Lat. by the form of the verb, and in most cases sufficiently so. But if a particular emphasis is to be laid on it, it is usual to employ the demonstrative pronoun ille, or, with ref. to a third party, hie; and if he is = he himself, the master, &c., it is rendered by ipse (see Ruhek. Ter. Andr. 2, 2, 23); e. g. they say that the Pythagoreans used to answer, 'h. hath said it,' Pythagoreos ferunt respondere solitos, Ipse dixit. The pronoun is also expressed when two actions of the same person are contrasted. It is used (1) of a person spoken of by name before (e. g. Polemarchus est Murgentinus, vir bonus atque honestus. Is quum

&c.); and (2) as the simple unemphatic antecedent to qui; he who, is qui (often, qui only: and in general propositions, si quis). 235 What has been just said, refers only to 'he' in the nominative; for the other cases a demonstrative pronoun must be used, except where it is sufficiently implied by the context. — Also for 'he,' 'him,' &c., when = 'a person,' the Latinus use humo; as, do you know him? nosti hominem? I love him very much, valde hominem diligo. In the acc. with infm. 'he' must be translated by se ('that' being omitted). In oblique narration (to which the construction of acc. with infm. belongs, when the principal verb and the infm. have the same subject), 'him,' &c., is translated by sui, sibi, se, when the person so designated is the nom. of the principal sentence; by ipse for the nom., and where the use of the reflexive would occasion an ambiguity; e. g. putat hoc sibi nocere: Gajus contemnebat divitias, quod se felicem reddere non possent. Sibi there are also persons spoken of, and others spoken to. These must be denoted by is, hic, ille. Legationis Ariovistus respondit: si quid ipsi a Cæsare opus esset, sese ad eum venturum fuisse: si quid ille se velit, illum ad se venire oportere (here the speaker, Ariovistus, uses ipse and sui of himself; and having first named Cæsar, the person spoken of, he afterwards designates him by is and ille). So, too, if he had spoken to Cæsar, the direct, si quid mihi a te opus esset, would become si quid sibi (or ipsi) a Cæsare (or ab eo) alio opus esset, &c. But even of the speaker himself, the demonstr. 'is' is its own; Socrates respondit, sese meruisse . . . ut ei victus quotidianus in Prytaneo publice præberetur (C. Or. 1, 54). See His.

HEAD, v. primum locum obtinere (g. t., to stand at the h. of athg). — In primâ acie versari. primum aciem obtinere (to be placed in the first rank of an army). — exercitui præesse (to command an army). — principem se rei esse. principatum se rei tenere. principem se rei locum obtinere (to be the first in it). — caput se rei esse (to be the head of it).
